With all the bad news about Court challenges being thrown out, here's one to keep an eye on. British Columbia may very well have a class-action suit against Bonnie Henry and the B.C. Government get to Trial in April 2023. This comes from the Canadian Society for the Advancement of Science in Public Policy, or CSASPP.

It's nice to see regular status updates, which should be commonplace in litigation that involves public donations. People don't want to be left in the dark.

B.C. uses a service called "Court Services Online", which allows members of the public to search for cases in the Supreme Court, and Court of Appeal. However, it's behind a paywall, so here are some highlights of what's been going on.

It appears there have been Court appearances every few months (on average). This is encouraging to see, as long silences make people wonder.

Here are the notes of the decisions thus far, and it's mostly procedural stuff.

1. The orders sought in the Notice of Application dated October 26, 2022, attached as schedule A is granted with the following edits: They video may only feature the faces of counsel for the plaintiff and the judge. The camera must not capture the faces of counsel for the respondents or the court clerk or the sheriff or members of the public or other participants unless express and clear permission is granted. Any inadvertent capture of a face of such a justice participant must be pixelated or deleted before broadcast.
2. With respect to proposed order 1(U): When the parties eventually agree upon a website and a broadcasting format, it is not to end with an agreement between counsel. Accordingly, once the proposal is reached by agreement between counsel, the parties or one party on behalf of both parties should make the communication to the court, that communication should also set out the safeguards designed to minimize risks and in particular the risks identified by the respondents presently. The court will consider these reassurances as well as the specifications proposed, and if appropriate will issue approval.
3. The site in which the proceeding will be broadcasted must not have a comment section or ability to comment on the video.

Yes, the courts do proceed at a snail's pace, but it's nice to be able to see some progress being made. This is especially important for donors who have chipped in.

There is to be a certification hearing from December 12 to 16, 2022. That's just a few weeks away. The Judge will make the decision as to whether this class action will go ahead or not.

If the case is certified, then BCPHO Bonnie Henry would be forced to testify under oath. And she does have so much to answer for.

There are a few other (smaller) cases that CSASPP is working on, but this class action is by far the largest. We will see how things turn out.

As for other B.C. news: remember that in August 2021, Action4Canada filed an incoherent 400 page Notice of Civil Claim in Vancouver. Predictably, it was struck in its entirety, although a rewrite was allowed. Instead of fixing the problem, it was appealed for some strange reason.

The CSASPP/A4C comparison is like professional baseball v.s. children's T-ball. Guess having competent lawyers does make a difference. Then again, the T-ball players generally don't sue spectators for pointing out glaring flaws.

In any event, the certification hearing in December will be worth watching, and hopefully it will be broadcast online. Below is just a section of the documents that are available. Many more aren't listed.
